

Back Again

Summer was over and it was time to hit the books again. This year was different from the last, with many changes haven taken place. For one, the rules were enforced to a greater extent and administrators did not tolerate things they had in the past years.

When questioned about her first day, Junior Ayana Carson said, "The first day is always the slowest, but as the weeks go by, it gets better. It was also nice to see how my friends had changed over the swummer." Several Freshman mentioned that they were lost and very nervous. Eventually, students said they got the hang of it and started liking all the new people they were seeing.

Some of the students returning this year used the first day to catch up on the latest gossip. That was exactly what Latasha Pinkney said about the first day. "For me", she said, "the first day of school was pretty interesting because I got to check out all the coolest guys and catch up on the latest gossip." Guys, on the other hand, said they were just chillin' and getting use to the new school year.

The main topic for most people was friends. For instance, Sophomore, John Adams said, "On the first day of school I was scared that I wouldn't have many friends, but I made a lot of new friends and saw a lot of my old friends." Another returning student, Sonte' Johnson, had something to say about her friends. "The first day of school, I felt good that I started going back to school, meeting all of my old friends, and also seeing all of my old and new teachers. It was wonderful." Although Cora Feaster's first day emotions were a little different than others, they were about friends too. "My first day was a disaster; communicating with friends and those others who needed me."

The first day, all in all, was a new start. Friends were made, old records were thrown away, and new faces gave our school a new name.

Choices, Decisions

Art Pigate decides whether he wants a Coca-Cola or Mello Yello at lunch as a replacement of the milk.

"Where Are We Going?"

Confused about where there next class is located, Freshman Erica Belk and Shannon Cooper scuffle through the hall.
