Sophomores Find Time For Fun

The sophomores look upon schoolwork as an unnecessary evil that must be fit into their daily schedules. Of the class of thirty-two, the majority of them are involved in athletics, school organizations, or part-time jobs. This makes study time extremely limited; yet, somehow, it still gets done. Cramming (or pretending to cram) for tests is common during classes or at break. As a rule, the sophomores cannot have more than one test a day (this is called test-a-phobia). When more than one is assigned, fear and panic strike, but normally the tenth graders come out on top.

The sophomores are as serious about playing as they are about avoiding schoolwork. They are well known for doing imitations of teachers and other famous people. Although all try doing imitations, Freddie Glenn is "Well . . ." the master.

When the weekend comes, the sophomores are eager to get together. Whether it's getting together to watch TV at someone's house or going to Columbia, these students always have fun. Heaven forbid that there should be homework on weekends.

Literally working day and night, Aimee Price learned that yearbook layout and design was not just drawing lines. She attended Josten's Yearbook Workshop at Converse College in June.
