

Many colleges have scholar programs for outstanding students. Recipients of these awards were: (standing) Allan Turner and Dean Branham; (top) Beverly Rice, Gina Robinson, Michelle Benson, Kay Gustafson, and Doug Raley.

Rice becomes a Guvie

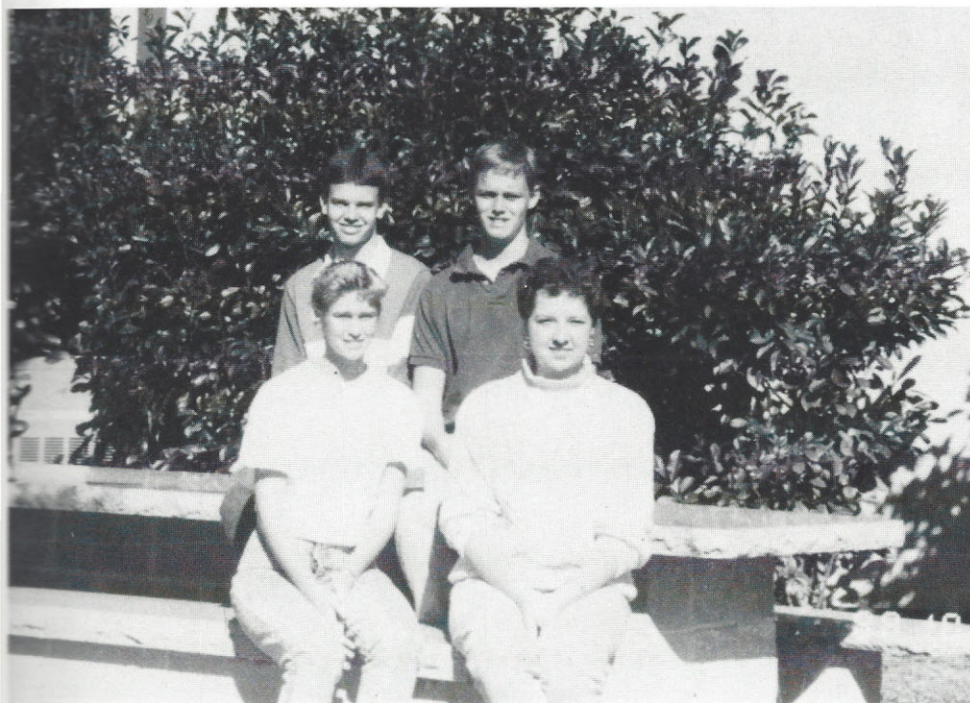

Over the summer, I attended the Governor's School of South Carolina for academic excellence at the College of Charleston. During the five weeks, I, a "Guvie," went to classes in my subject concentration, which was math, and in global issues. I had classes until three in the afternoon with a little over an hour for lunch.

After my classes were finished for the day, there were many activities planned in which anyone could participate. These included two sports programs, movies, dances, and trips to the beach; but I was always able to go to the market to shop or just to stop by Swenson's for ice cream during my free time.

Although this program was geared as an educational experience, a tremendous amount of fun was also involved. My new-found friends and I discovered many diversions to keep us from our studies: there were late night walks to the battery, games of pool at the student center, pranks on anyone handy, and the ever popular late night game of phone tag.

Going to Governor's School was probably the most enriching and rewarding experience I have ever had. I know the other 249 Guvies and I share memories of fun and learning in a program that was designed for our interests, and I know I will treasure this experience always.

By Beverly Rice

Dawn Lee, Aimee Price, Brad Douglas, and Allan Turner participated in the Farm Bureau Leadership Conference. They attended classes and also went to Oconee State Park one day.

Dean Branham (alternate) and Beverly Rice were chosen to participate in the 1988 Governor's School.
