

SEVENTH GRADE

A KING'S THRONE. At a monument in King's Mountain State Park, these seventh graders pose to take a picture. This field trip taught the students about the Revolutionary War battle that took place there.

When do you most often do your homework? Why then?

Jenni Caldwell — "... when I get home and sometimes in class when I forget to do it at home."

Gill Harkins — "... when I'm sitting in my room listening to the radio at about 9:00. I have got better things to do during the day."

J.D. Hodges — "... about 4:30; it's habit."

Kevin McDaniel — "... at the end of the year because that's when my grades really start counting."

Ward Coleman — "... about 4:00 so I have time to do other things."

Matt Gilreath — "... activity period, so I will not have to do it at home."

Kerri Varnadore — "... in study hall or at home because it is quiet and I am able to think more clearly."

DID THEY RUN OUT OF SEATS? Seventh graders Matt Gilreath, Wes Melvin, and Michael Lippert take a snack break in the luggage compartment of the bus. Hopefully, no one had to be tied to the top of the bus.

BACK TO COLONIAL TIMES. The seventh graders are transported back in time as they listen to the stories of how things were in the colonial days. However, the group decided they liked modern times a lot more.

STROLLING THROUGH THE PARK. Seventh graders Shelley Ramsey, Lacey Feaster, and Kristen Keroson smile as they stroll through the park. Despite being a little bit cold, the girls were able to stay in good humor.
