Notes for DAVID MOBLEY DIXON:

To quote from the book, "The Mobleys and Their Connections," written in 1915: "He (David) was killed in a railroad accident. One of the most promising young men of our family. He had gone to Charlotte to take his train as a conductor. He was to bring the engine and tender back to Columbia the next morning. A telegraphic order was missent and a head end collision occurred a mile above Winnsboro, about 4:00 in the morning. It so chanced that the writer (I think that the "writer" of this selection was William Woodward Dixon--the one who compiled the Mobley book) was the first to climb up and discover David, his body entirely covered with anthracite coal, with the exception of his pale handsome face in striking contrast to the blackened mass about him. It is the finest roses that are the ones plucked in the garden. Sometimes it is the same way in the garden of life. It seems to me that way about David. His brothers would have us say this."
