Greetings from Mary and Russ in Dawson, Georgia

Some information to pass on re our conversation about the Gibsons.

We found the cemetery near the Alec Robinson (now Baker) house. It holds about a dozen graves and the names are Trapp and Black, mostly Trapp.

To reach it, you turn down Landis Road and watch on your left, within a few hundred yards you will see a lumber road secured with a heavy iron gate. Down that road perhaps a half mile. You will pass two old cabins, the second one has a pile of granite blocks in front. As you turn the corner away from it you will see the pillars and headstones. One grave was that of Ursin Trapp, a DAR veteran.

Now about a Gibson graveyard. We didn't find one but we did find an interesting thing that might relate. Book NN Page 247 of the Fairfield Deeds and Conveyances is about a trade of land (1.2 acres for 1.2 acres) between James Mobley and Jacob Gibson, on one hand, and Benjamin T. Cockrell on the other. The conveyance speaks of the "use and benefit of said church on the Wateree Creek." The church referred to is A Baptist Church. Think the county surveyor might be able to pinpoint the locations of these parcels?

Another interesting note is found in the History of Fairfield County, page 74, to wit: "Crooked Run Church, which many years hence became a Baptist church and received the name Crooked Run. It is said the old church was sold and the lumber were largely used to build a house near where Alex Robinson lives. This place in Revolutionary days was owned by Stephen Gibson, 1st. Stephen Gibson's second wife, Martha Andrews was buried on the hill behind the Robinson house. The DAR location for Rev. Jacob Gibson also says "behind the Alex Robinson house". We are convinced the Gibsons are somewhere up there and want to come around more on our next trip. In any event, any thing you might think of, or dig up (sorry about that) would be appreciated.

Last item: can you let us know the name of the book you mentioned which told of the battle around the Meeting House. It will make good material to include in our findings.

In closing, we remain
