

Fifty Years Hence

Fifty years hence will find conditions in Fairfield County very different from those of today. Let us imagine we are living in the year 1996.

It has been three years since the close of another World War. The country is enjoying a period of great prosperity due to it. It was fought in the air with motorless planes. The planes of the enemy's Nations were completely destroyed by bombs containing deadly poison gas. Fairfield's Sons and daughters nobly bore their part in this international conflict.

We find Winnaboro a beautiful city, spread out over a large area. Many skyscrapers have been built. In the east of these we find a broadcasting system which is received all over the world. The buildings are built in order to conserve space. They haven't any windows as they are artificially lighted and air-conditioned. The finest of our buildings are constructed of our own native granite. We find some built of copper and stainless steel, with glass used for insulation. We have a centralized school for Fairfield County. Pupils are transported by motor buses which have a capacity of several hundred. The trades and science courses are emphasized more than the literary.

The County of Government has been entirely democratic, and our people realize that democracy is the best form of government yet devised.

Winnaboro's suburbs, Ridgeway and Blackstock, are since cities. Their large manufacturing plants furnish a source of living for the inhabitants. The operators work seven days a week.

We find little farming done, as cattle raising is the principal occupation. Growing trees for our large paper mills is also noted.
